A country with two languages

One of the first things that people see when they go to Ireland are the road signs. They are in English and Irish. In the Republic of Ireland all information must be in English and Irish.

For two thousand years most people in Ireland spoke Irish. But in the 16th century England invaded Ireland. From that time on more and more people spoke English. From the 19th century most people spoke English as their first language. Today all school children must learn Irish. For this reason most people in Ireland can speak Irish. However, only about 10% of Irish people speak Irish at home. Today people want to protect the Irish language because they understand that a language is an important part of people's lives.
